Making a Difference:
Deaf Support Workers

As Australia's largest employer of Deaf people, our organisation employs hundreds of Deaf and Auslan-fluent staff to support our community across the country. One of these staff members is Olivia Jackson, a Support Worker providing services to Deaf NDIS participants. As a Deaf woman herself, Olivia shared why her lived experience is central to her job.

"At my previous role, no one knew how to communicate with me. Every shift I arrived at work and faced barriers. The communication wasn't there. I felt isolated and lonely.

But moving to Deaf Connect as a Support Worker is so different. The freedom I feel, the ease of communication - it just feels natural. It's not a job; it's something I genuinely enjoy.

One of the barriers Deaf people face is that English is not our first language - it's Auslan. Because I share that experience with my clients, we can connect on a much deeper level. I communicate with them and understand their Deaf identity.

My favourite part is working with so many different clients - helping them learn new skills, supporting them to get out into the community, and empowering them. That's what I love.

We're guided by what our clients want to do. They may need support with social connection, building their skills, or getting outdoors and exercising.

Some days we go to a gallery for a social gathering, or I might spend time with a client working towards a specific goal. Everything we do is tailored to their service plans and what they want, to develop their independence and life skills.

Being able to adapt to what our clients want, learning their personalities, and respecting their choices. It's a constant learning and sharing opportunity, and I think that's so valuable."

Deaf Connect Support Workers like Olivia use Auslan every day to ensure Deaf NDIS clients feel included and understood. This approach removes any barriers to communication - both for the staff delivering support and for the clients receiving these services.

Thank you for helping us to continue making a difference.
